How Mobile Homes Correlate With Per Capita Income

Randall K. Johnson*

This study explores the nature of the relationship between the number of state-regulated mobile homes and per capita income, so as to determine whether higher-income parts of Illinois have more mobile homes than would be predicted by a recent BBC News article. It does so by identifying a simple way to determine the direction and strength of any relationship between mobile homes and per capita income, which that article assumes to be negative, if only at the county level in Illinois. The study, specifically, collects and analyzes mobile home data from Illinois and per capita income data from the U.S. Census. After combining these data, then using correlation coefficients, it finds a positive relationship—albeit with different intensities, based on whether the proxy for mobile homes in each county is the number of mobile home spaces or the number of mobile home parks in 2017.

INTRODUCTION

Do lower-income parts of the U.S. have more mobile homes than higher-income ones? One might think so, based on a 2013 report from BBC News.¹ This report found that “comparing the top 10 mobile home states with the 10 most deprived states suggests a loose correlation,”² although it does not provide a way of substantiating such a claim at the sub-state level. As a result, more research is needed to find out if and how mobile homes correlate with per capita income: especially as affordable housing has become an even more pressing issue in the wake of COVID-19.³

My study carries out some of this follow-up work by creating, and later analyzing, a new State of Illinois dataset. It does so by drawing upon information about the 853 licensed mobile home parks and 53,291 licensed mobile home spaces that were hosted by 94 of Illinois’s 102 counties.⁴ This study, then, matches mobile home data from Fiscal Year 2017 with relevant U.S. Census information.⁵ It concludes by determining whether and how the number of mobile homes in each county correlates with the per capita incomes in that area.

Such a study may yield valuable insights into where mobile homes are located at the county-level and, potentially, into why Illinois residents choose this type of affordable housing over other competing alternatives.⁶ The study could prove to be even more useful if it yields valid and reproducible results.⁷ A simple way to achieve such results may be to use correlation coefficients.⁸

My study, therefore, is justified in using correlation coefficients. By definition, correlation coefficients are a simplified statistical approach that determines the direction and strength of the relationship between variables.⁹ The simplified approach works by showing whether and how the number of licensed mobile homes and per capita income are related at the county level in Illinois: at least for 94 of the 102 Illinois counties during Fiscal Year 2017.¹⁰

Within this context, the study proceeds in four additional parts (Parts I-III). Part I contains this study's positive analysis. Part II describes its methodological approach. Part III contains this study's normative analysis, which builds upon a finding that mobile homes may be positively and relatively weakly correlated with per capita income in Illinois counties. Part V is this study's conclusion, which summarizes its key findings and recommendations.

POSITIVE ANALYSIS

Mobile homes, which are a historically overlooked form of U.S. housing tenure, have become an increasingly popular way for governments to provide affordable housing.¹¹ In recent years, mobile homes have been used by federal, state, and local governments to offset the unintended consequences of economic development.¹² Non-governmental actors, including legal scholars and some newspaper reporters, nonetheless assume mobile homes have a negative relationship to economic development measures.¹³ This commonly-held assumption, despite not being put to the test in detailed case studies, has been accepted as true by many U.S. statutory, administrative, and decisional laws.¹⁴

For example, the Illinois General Assembly enacted its original Mobile Home Park Act, the state's primary means of conveying indirect affordable housing subsidies to certain low-income areas.¹⁵ Other sources of law, such as Section 860.400 of the Manufactured Home Community Code, were added later

10. Correlation coefficients also are used for three additional reasons. First, this simplified statistical approach is widely viewed as a valid way to establish the direction and strength of a relationship. Second, correlations are also easy to verify using Microsoft Excel. Lastly, this simplified statistical approach may lay a solid foundation for future research that looks at mobile homes and per capita income. Cf. Randall K. to provide additional benefits and protections.¹⁶ When viewed as a whole, this body of law is intended to create and protect this frequently-overlooked form of affordable housing, mostly by limiting informational failures through mandatory legal disclosures, especially in less economically-dynamic parts of Illinois.¹⁷

Unfortunately, few scholars and reporters bother to examine whether this state-level regulation actually lives up to its promise.¹⁸ Instead, one category of scholarship looks at the lived experience of mobile home residents.¹⁹ Other works examine the total cost of acquiring and maintaining a mobile home.²⁰ A third category of scholarship describes the function of mobile homes in the U.S.²¹

As a result, the existing literature on mobile homes still does not answer a basic question: How does the number of mobile homes correlate with traditional measures of economic development such as per capita income?²² This question is important because it avoids the difficult issue of causation, especially if it is narrowly-framed in terms of a single measure, while yielding insight into the nature of any relationship between the number of mobile homes in an area and local economic dynamism.²³ My study thus asks and answers this open research question, at least for 94 of the 102 Illinois counties during Fiscal Year 2017.²⁴

This study does so by creating and using a new Illinois dataset, which makes three contributions to the mobile home literature. First, it identifies every licensed mobile home in Illinois and matches each with the per capita income of its host jurisdiction (i.e., county area).²⁵ Second, this study uses these data to determine which Illinois county areas had the most licensed mobile homes and highest per capita incomes.²⁶ Lastly, it analyzes these data using correlation coefficients, to find out if Illinois county areas with higher per capita incomes also had larger numbers of licensed mobile homes in Fiscal Year 2017.²⁷

II. METHODOLOGY

This study creates and analyzes a new Illinois dataset, in order to determine how the number of state-licensed mobile homes correlate with per capita incomes at the county level.²⁸ All mobile home data were collected by the State of Illinois, and sub-state entities such as Cook County and the City of Chicago,²⁹ whereas the per capita income data comes from the U.S. Census's American Community Survey.³⁰ Both datasets were later subjected to validity checks.³¹

These two data sources, subsequently, were combined and used to compute group-level averages by county location.³² These group-level averages are used later to create baselines for the full population of Illinois counties.³³ These baselines, in turn, are used to determine whether each of the sample has been drawn from the same population and may fall along a normal distribution.³⁴

This study later uses these data to make a series of findings based upon its interpretation of correlation coefficients. Correlation coefficients are used for at least three practical reasons. First, this approach provides a way to examine the relationship between the number of licensed mobile homes and per capita incomes, assuming that these two variables are useful proxies.³⁵ Second, the use of correlation coefficients allows for meaningful comparisons to be made between counties of different sizes.³⁶ Lastly, it complements previous studies by finding out whether and how mobile homes correlate with per capita income in a single U.S. state (Illinois), using standard units (counties) and in a recent year (2017).³⁷

I note, however, that this study's findings will not be accurate if it fails to account for selection effects, omitted variables and other methodological issues.³⁸ This study directly addresses each issue.³⁹ It accounts for selection effects by testing only those Illinois counties with a state-regulated mobile home parking space, as these geographic areas are a part of the same Illinois economy and experience similar economic conditions over time.⁴⁰ The study also deals with omitted variables by testing these counties, individually and in groups, in order to determine if there are real differences between similarly-situated areas.⁴¹ Other issues, like reverse causation, are limited by using correlation coefficients to carry out this very modest study of how mobile homes correlate with per capita income in 94 of the 102 counties in Illinois.⁴²

These methodological safeguards, if properly employed in this study, help to overcome a range of theoretical and practical issues.⁴³ The study, thus, asks and answers a single research question: how does the number of licensed mobile homes correlate with per capita income?⁴⁴ I answer this question by finding out, at least during Fiscal Year 2017, whether the Illinois counties with the highest per capita incomes also had the highest numbers of licensed mobile homes.⁴⁵

III.

NORMATIVE ANALYSIS

To summarize, this study draws on mobile home data and per capita income information from the most recent American Community Survey.⁴⁶ These sources of information are then combined and analyzed to determine the nature of any relationship between the number of licensed mobile homes and per capita income.⁴⁷ The expectation, at least based on the findings from a 2013 BBC News article, is that mobile homes are negatively correlated with per capita income.

The use of correlation coefficients requires this study to rank each county by number of licensed mobile home spaces and per capita income.⁴⁸ Higher numbers are equated with higher rankings, whereas lower numbers are equated with lower rankings.⁴⁹ In cases where the starting point is zero (0) licensed mobile home spaces, then that county will be excluded from the population.⁵⁰

As a result, this study is able to explain the relationship between the number of licensed mobile home spaces and per capita incomes.⁵¹ Generally speaking, a zero (0) result implies that there is no relationship between two variables, 0.01 to 0.29 (or -0.01 to -0.29) is a weak relationship, 0.30 to 0.49 (-0.30 to -0.49) is a weak-to-moderate relationship, 0.50 to 0.69 (or -0.50 to -0.69) is a moderate-to-strong relationship, 0.70 to 0.99 (or -0.70 to -0.99) is a strong relationship and 1 (or -1) is a perfectly-linear relationship. This scale may be used to find out if and how mobile home spaces correlate with per capita income, at least in 94 of 102 Illinois counties during the study period (i.e., during Fiscal Year 2017), which is important because the lack of viable affordable housing options across state space has become an even more pressing issue in the wake of COVID-19.⁵²

The initial results of this analysis are as follows, at least in Fiscal Year 2017. There is a positive and weak-to-moderate relationship between the number of licensed mobile home spaces and per capita income (.35).⁵³ Since this result is likely to be statistically significant,⁵⁴ due to its probability values, it may support a claim that these variables could move together in Fiscal Year 2017.⁵⁵ This study thus concludes that recent BBC News findings about how mobile homes correlate with per capita income may not be true (i.e., these variables are not negatively related, as is also assumed by many non-governmental actors).⁵⁶

This result does not mean that the number of licensed mobile home spaces are always positively and weakly-to-moderately correlated with per capita incomes. Rather, it merely indicates that scholars need to do additional work. One approach may consist of finding out if the number of licensed mobile homes correlate with per capita income when using different proxies.⁵⁷ A second option involves determining if these two variables are correlated in other geographic areas.⁵⁸ A third approach involves finding out if any other empirical approaches yield similar results.⁵⁹ In any event, more research is needed to determine the direction and strength of any relationship between these variables in Illinois.⁶⁰

In employing the first option, this study seeks to further interrogate its sole research question. Specifically, the goal is to further establish whether and how mobile homes may correlate with per capita income by substituting the “licensed mobile homes” proxy variable with the “licensed mobile home parks” proxy variable. The study period (Fiscal Year 2017) and unit of analysis (94 counties with a mobile home and/or mobile home park) are the same for the initial and the secondary analysis (i.e., for mobile homes and for mobile home parks).

Within this context, my follow-up research yields a weaker but similarly-positive result (.21).⁶¹ As this result is likely to be statistically significant,⁶² due to its probability values, it also supports the claim that these variables may move in the same direction (albeit with different levels of intensity based upon the proxy used).⁶³ Thus, the study concludes that recent BBC News findings may not be true for either proxy during the study period (i.e., during Fiscal Year 2017).⁶⁴

These initial and secondary results indicate that higher-income counties may have higher numbers of mobile homes, and higher numbers of mobile home parks, than would be predicted. If these findings prove to be true, then contemporary views of where mobile homes are located may not hold up under scrutiny. Thus, more research will be needed on Illinois and other U.S. states.

Other normative implications of such a finding are equally straightforward. For example, Illinois should determine why some residents of higher-income counties choose to live in mobile homes instead of other types of affordable housing such as limited equity cooperatives.⁶⁵ Illinois should also try to identify the key reasons why higher-income counties have a higher number of mobile homes than would have been predicted.⁶⁶ Lastly, Illinois should find out whether

62. The initial result had probability values of 0.021102 (one-tailed test) and 0.042205 (two-tailed test). Thus, only modest conclusions may be drawn about the relationship between these variables. These conclusions are that there is some evidence that the null hypothesis in this study cannot be accepted (i.e., that there is some relationship between the number of mobile homes and per capita income).

non-economic considerations created a substitution effect with respect to affordable housing and if it has a disparate impact by race or ethnicity. Among the state-level policies that could explain such impacts are the salience of mobile homes as an affordable housing option, the preferential tax treatment that mobile homes historically received⁶⁷ and the current ban on local rent control.⁶⁸

CONCLUSION

This study looks at the nature of the relationship between the number of state-regulated mobile homes and per capita income, so as to determine whether higher-income parts of Illinois have more mobile homes than would be predicted by a recent BBC News article. It does so by identifying a simple way to determine the direction and strength of the relationship between mobile homes and per capita income, correlation coefficients, which my study uses to show that this relationship is positive and relatively weak in 2017. However, more research is needed to find out precisely how mobile homes correlate with per capita income.

[because] . . . people in [conventional residential properties and mobile homes] . . . use the same services and yet . . . mobile home and manufactured homes paid much less taxes.”).
